Having recently re-read Politics, the Constitution and the Warren Court, I couldn't help but wonder what my old mentor would have thought of the work of the Roberts Court. After all, the Roberts Court is dominated by "conservative" rather than "liberal" justices, so Kurland would be pleased, right? Wrong. First, for critics of the Warren Court like Kurland, the proper stance of Supreme Court justices ordinarily should be one of judicial restraint. But the Roberts-Scalia-Thomas-Alito wing of the current Court is anything but restrained. To the contrary, these modern-day "conservatives" are often extremely activist in their interpretations of the Constitution. They are not in any way "conservatives" in the Kurland-Frankfurter mold. Kurland. Politics, the Constitution, and the Warren Court. by. Philip B. Kurland. The Warren Court's third weakness was its failure to persuade. "The Court's opinions have tended toward fiat rather than reason." One may wonder whether, law professors aside, the Court could have writ-ten any opinion that would convince most southerners (or northerners) that segregated schools are discriminatory. Is the Constitution, then, far from an auxiliary protection against the excesses of majoritarian rule, to serve only as a means of rationalizing whatever vox populi demands? This may sound extreme, but what are we to make of this plea by Professor Kurland about the Court's credibility gap? "The Supreme Court has been and must continue to be a strong force in the vital center that provides cohesion for a democratic society."
